The use of simulation in the design stages of complex control systems has warranted the development of new methodology for transferring logic from model to actual system. This paper emphasizes the importance of maintaining simulation integrity during actual system implementation and presents four methods to aid in accomplishing this. These four methods of logic transfer are discussed and compared using the example of an AGV system simulation.

An input/output system of intelligent, programmable, solid-state power I/O modules inherently distributed to the point of control through integrated serial communications has been developed to provide a stand-alone, user-configurable I/O module. Design of this special I/O product was driven by the demand for greater diagnostics capability and lower installed costs required by programmable controller users. The product development, involving a new 5,500 gate equivalent VLSI chip and a smart ...
